

Ntswembu is a premier new multimedia brand, focusing on Television, Film and Advertising. They consistently produce high quality, entertaining, interesting, edgy, captivating, and educational multimedia productions. The film production will be lead by an experienced, motivated crew, specialising in research, marketing, PR and film production.

We will be hosting industry workshops as part of our talent development and recruitment process. Our workshops will be designed specifically to enable women to gain confidence in digital creative skills. Our recruitment will target women working in an informal capacity to help them build the practical skills and insight about how to be a freelancer or start a business.

We would like to tell the story of Ladysmith Black Mambazo through their own words in a feature documentary. Our film will crisscross between interviews with the founder and members of the band, and various people who have had a personal or professional impact on the band and archival footage. These interviews will span the globe chronicling the bands rise through the years in their small town to their global breakthrough. We will also get a glimpse into the world of the band as they prepare for gigs and rehearse, watching the intimate creative process unfold. The documentary examines the partnership between Joseph Shabalala and his band members which also happen to be his brothers and their leading roles in a chain of transformative events in contemporary culture.

We expect the final product to have a life long legacy in raising aspirations for children to embrace their cultural heritage and also to value their individual difference. The documentary will be screened and made available all around the world. This allows the aspiring women an opportunity to link their experience to a world wide publication.
