

What if nobody had cared?

Giving children attention gives children opportunity: to grow confidence and feel safe doing it, to learn about the world and all it can offer, and to develop health for a lifetime.

But too often, kids don't get what they need. They "fall through the cracks" or "slip through the system."

We can change that.

Working together with supporters like you around the world, the Steve Nash Foundation is growing health in kids by implementing initiatives premised on the idea that children matter.

Bringing research and attending critical needs resources to bear on the most vulnerable of our populations will change trajectories, change outcomes, and change the world.

Caring for kids means learning what children need and making sure that every child — every child — knows we care.
